Poultry Culling Important

Officials of the Poultry Branch have observed that many poultry very year because they do not take to their flocks. They don't remove the old layers, early moulters, or other unprofitable birds—and one of the reasons why they don't is because they're not equipped with the proper means of catching the birds. Either poultry men cull their flocks at they still lose money. To catch the birds, they chase them around with a hook and as a result produce many drops.

The Poultry Branch recommends that a catching crate be used for this purpose. It's not hard to make.

PASTURE USE

Young pasture plants, both grasses and legumes, are more numerous than the plants in the later stages of growth. On the other hand the carrying capacity of a pasture is less with growth. How can these conflicting claims be adjusted? The best advantage of the situation, says the Supervisor of Crop Improvement, suggests that a middle path be taken and an attempt made to produce both nutritious pasture and to supply.

One of the best ways to do this is to adopt a system of rotations and grazing. Under such a system the ably more parts, and each part in turn. On dairy farms, the milking cows should go on pasture when the growth is four to six inches high; then when the pasture is partially eaten down the dry stock should be turned in. The use of electric fence makes such a plan simple and easy to put into effect.

Canadian bacon for shipment to Britain is being given a new middle ground that will maintain its quality and make it more tasty to consumers. This can be done because the shipping is available and the product does not have to be stored as it had to heretofore.
